The old chap couldn't set this thing up to cut square no matter what. The cut seemed to wander and burn on one side. He was convinced the machine was not built properly. Then I swapped the supplied blade for one of my spares a Perform 80T and voila perfect results. Thanks for the advice btw Hamilton Power Tools are the distributor. They do seem very close to Delta at least in the mitre saw models. Since Hamilton lost the Delta distributorship to Toolbank I guess this brand has filled the space. Rgds Noel On opening the box and trying to become familiar with the saw I found it very difficult to understand the instruction booklet owing to its very poor translation from the original Chinese. e.g. After finished with the job, wipe the shred and dust stuck to tool. Keep cover. I was pleasantly surprised to read that it had adjustable depth of cut for trenching which isn't mentioned in the TV advert. It then took me 2 hours to find where this was. roll It has a 75mm depth and 290 crosscut capacity. On looking through some of my catalogues I found very few with the same capacity. I had not been looking forward to making a covered area like a carport along the back of the house, sawing the timber by hand.

Now I can saw the uprights to length and at the angle to suit the fall of the covering but can also saw the joists at the right angle to fit the wall plate and uprights. With the depth of cut facility I can also cut housings in the uprights at the correct angle. For me this means the saw will pay for itself by making this covered area. Any further use will be a bonus. Ill add to this report once I have finished the covered area. Cheers, Alf The depth stop is only a piece of steel with a slot along the length through which goes a bolt that tightens it in place so getting a good adjustment will be hit and miss. With a little knowledge of working with steel it can be replaced with something that can be locked in place with a setscrew and another at rightangles to give better fine depth adjustment. That is something to try in the future. This appeared to be an error in the aluminium casting and the 4 bolt holes drilled in it. I tried elongating the holes with a round file but it was slow work. I found a round fine rotary file in my old toolbox and used this in a power drill. In less than 5 minutes I refitted the fence. This time a test cut was perfect after a slight adjustment. Both of these lock the saw in the up position. I hope that is some help to you billyboy99 I too purchased the saw from the TV shopping channel. I now need new brushes. Can anyone who owns one please tell me where these can be bought. I bought it to build a shed, yes it is noisy but a great tool never bothered with the manual either press and pull everything and see what it does bit like computers lol !!! I was hoping it would survive long enough to finish a cladding project and the decking I am useless with a hand saw Thanks! Rob Pull it out and u should be able to release the arm. Rgds Rob I suggests that you will probably find a knob on the base where the arm assembly is attached as I said it is a small black knob that you need to pull out on mine.

Sorry cant help any further if it is different. Rgds. It may not display this or other websites correctly. You should upgrade or use an alternative browser. Stick to established makers like Makita, Bosch, etc if you want an accurate tool you might not get a bells and whistles saw for the same amount of money, but with mitre saws accuracy is everything ScritThe accurate SCMSs are all trades machines and most of them are 300 plus, discounted. Why do you need a sliding compound saw if you are only doing beadings. The question is what are you going to be cutting that cant be done on a 10in or 12in compound nonslider and please dont saw 16 x 9 roofing beams. Im asking this because I rarely need to cut much bigger than 7 x 1in or the like skirtings, architraves or sometimes 5 x 2in cornices ScritMy use will be general purpose really, from detail up to shelving widths. Taking the slide out fo the equation, can i still get something reasonable in the price rangeA cheap Chaiwanese saw has neither the longevity nor the accuracy you require. Theres no such thing as a free meal IMHO Bosun. Id rather have Bo Selecta! ScritIf I spent 150 on that Rexon would it last or am I best adding a ton to my budget and going for a makita or suchlike. All comments welcome, thanks.If you are doing roofing trusses then you probably need a 12in or certainly at least a 10in SCMS. If all you intend to do is skirtings, floorboards, architraves, etc which are fairly thin then a smaller blade machine such as the Makita LS0174 can be a lot better value than its bigger bladed brother, the LS1214 same crosscut widths 300mm only the depth varies ScritThe Makita would be cutting it a bit close on the width for me, whereas that Rexon seems a bitgood to be true. Any reports on the acuracy or reliabilityof those. Of that model particularly. v cheap.I did see someone doing them about 5 cheaper a couple of weeks back, but that may have been a oneoff promo.

ScritSo far Ive been up to about 155mm thickness on skirting and I think with more packing could increase that a shade. Edit got it here But looking at that blade diameter, how close to the 216mm crosscut of the Dewalt can that get. At 260mm diameter i would have thought pretty close no This would normally tighten, but in the case of many of these saws, it loosens it. Check that first. The condition you deacrive is dangerous. Please fix it before you use it any more. If you require additional assistance, let me know. Otherwise, check RepairClonic.com for parts and technical instruction from their crack crew. Thanks for the opportunity to lend you a hand a On most table saws that I work on there is no fan or anything like that to force the dust away from unit, the best way is to run a shop vac and connect to the elbow for mazimum dust removal. Login to post If you have any further questions, please contact Ozito. Check out all the info you need or contact us. Remove the debris AFTER unplugging the cord.It is not mine.no user manual Pull the pin outward to release the lock. Here is a link to the online owners manual if you need to view it. The check in the back for a round knob with degrees marks on it, theres your adjuster.The blade blocks midway when I am From my experience, these guards operate using leverage, where a little motion results in a lot of movement to the guard. That means a little damage or wear in the linkage can make a big difference. A bushing may have shattered, or a pivot hole may be worn out. Reviews of this machine mention dust not going into the bag. Make sure dust is not jamming the guard works. Take care, having to move a guard while the blade is spinning is scary. Diamond cuting wheels are used for glass,.Diamond cuting wheels are used for glass, ceramics and tungsten carbide, CBN cutoff wheels are used for hard materials with a high affinity to carbon like steel or certain magnetic materials.

A variety of bonds was developed in order to cover all fields of application. The cutting rim is made out of sintered metal, resin or out of an electroplated bond, interspersed with diamond or CBN grit. Each combination of abrasive material, grit size, bond and concentration results in specific tool features and can easily be adapted to your individual requirement.
