Both are on a separate die that is still manufactured in 45nm whereas the CPU die is already manufactured in the new 32nm process. Compared to the older Core 2 Duo models, the i5560M should be faster than the T9900. Therefore, the Core i5560M is a high end dual core cpu which should handle all daily work and gaming tasks. Only the quad core i7 CPUs can be noticeably faster at tasks that require four or more threads e.g. rendering. A GeForce 9400M ION should still be a faster especially as Nvidia and ATI cards have a better driver support than Intel up to now. According to rumors, the GMA core will also use the Turbo Mode regulate the clock speed. Due to the Turbo Boost, the Core i5 is likely to use the whole TDP of 35 Watt under load and therefore can use more power than a similar specified Core 2 Duo. In Idle mode, the i5 uses clearly less power than the Core 2 Duo CPUs. Hyperthreading enables the Dual Core CPU to handle 4 threads at once for a better usage of the pipeline. Compared to the Core i5540M, the 480M does most likely not support AES, VTd and Trusted Execution functions and features a slower Turbo Boost 2.9 versus 3.06 GHz. However, the base clock rate is slightly higher. Both are on a separate die that is still manufactured in 45nm whereas the CPU die is already manufactured in the new 32nm process. Therefore, the Core i5480M is a high end dual core cpu which should handle all daily work and gaming tasks. It is clocked with 1.2 1.7 GHz if Turbo Boost is enabled. Each core is based on the Nehalem Westmere microarchitecture.<http://apex-equipments.com/userfiles/96-toyota-paseo-repair-manual.xml>

AES, VTd and Trusted Execution are deactivated for the 430UM, compared to the i7 UM CPUs. A feature of the new Core i5430UM is the integrated graphics card called Intel HD Graphics and memory controller. Both are on a separate die that is still manufactured in 45nm whereas the CPU die is already manufactured in the new 32nm process. Still the Turbo Boost may not trigger very often sometimes it is even not activated in the BIOS and therefore the maximum of 1.83 GHz may not be important. The performance should still be faster than the old GMA 4500MHD. New interactive map of NYC helps parents compare classrooms New interactive maps allow NYC parents to see what students and teachers are saying about their schools While most participated, some did not. Schools without any answers do not appear on this map. One teacher told the New York Post, "She comes in early, she goes to the gym. Even when class is in session, she's still in the gym." One parent said, "That's not right at all. The funds should go to helping school issues like going toward bullying campaigns." While elementary school students aren't asked about bullying, it seems likely that at a school where barely 1 in 5 teachers think order is maintained, bullying is quite a problem. Perez also related that another boy pretended to hump his backpack, telling her, "you know you want it so drop your pants. I'm gonna give it to you hard." Incidents like this are perhaps less shocking when you consider that 87 percent of the school's students say their peers don't respect each other. That's an order of magnitude better than its elementary school neighbors at P.S. 109 Sedgwick, 68 percent of teachers say order is not maintained, and at P.S.

226, 60 percent of teachers say their school is disorderly. If students at P.S. 204 stay in the neighborhood, they may see more disorder as they grow up At Intermediate School 232, less than a block away, 46 percent of students say physical fighting occurs frequently, and at M.S. 390, a whopping 70 percent of students say physical fighting happens "most" or "all" of the time. Only 6 percent of students say physical fighting is a frequent occurrence, and only 1 percent of students say they see gang activity. Students at neighboring schools aren't nearly so lucky At P.S. 140, 75 percent of students complain of frequent fights and 54 percent of gang activity; at M.S. 266, 52 percent of students cite frequent fights and 20 percent gang activity; at P.S. 308, 77 percent of students report frequent fights and 36 percent gang activity. At the neighboring Middle School for Art and Philosophy, 83 percent of students report mutual disrespect, 48 percent report frequent physical fighting, and 35 percent of teachers say order is not maintained. At Brownsville High School, less than a mile away, 34 percent of teachers say order isn't maintained, 35 percent say students don't respect each other, and 38 percent report frequent fighting. Only 2 percent of teachers there say order isn't maintained, only 10 percent of students say physical fighting is frequent, and only 14 percent cite bullying as a problem. Compare that to the Essence School, I.S. 311, where 31 percent of teachers say order isn't maintained, 51 percent say physical fighting occurs frequently, and 36 percent say bullying is a problem. If you live in East New York and want a safe school for your kids, your best option is a charter school. Only 5 percent of students say they feel unsafe in the halls, compared with 26 percent at the Cobble Hill School for American Studies, 23 percent at the Boerum Hill School for International Studies, and 22 percent at Brooklyn Frontiers High School.

This is particularly impressive, given that New Dawn specializes in helping students who have faced significant academic challenges and fallen behind on their credits towards obtaining a high school diploma.
